Source: iMore You may have a Nintendo account. You can have a Nintendo Network ID (NNID). If you've just started using nintendo switch, or you need to transfer data from another Nintendo console, you may find that you don't have both accounts linked. There are several reasons why connecting your Nintendo account to your NNID could benefit your gaming experience, such as being able to combine your eShop funds across devices. To connect your NNID to your Nintendo account. How to connect your Nintendo ID with your Nintendo account? What is the difference between a Nintendo Network ID and a Nintendo account? The short answer is that an NNID is used to make purchases on the Wii and 3DS, while a Nintendo account is used to make purchases on the Switch. If you have a Wii U or 3DS, you've probably created an NNID to use eShop or to access multiplayer features and other interactions for the entire system. When Nintendo launched Miitomo, it with it a new type of registration called a Nintendo Network ID. With this account, you can connect to Facebook and Twitter to find friends and keep track of your stats. Each account you've created on the Switch has its own unique account ID, and you can add friends to your account and interact with them. Again, when you connect your Nintendo account to your NNID, you're linking them together so you can use them both at once. The main reason for linking your NNID to your Nintendo account is to merge your funds. If you have $10 or $100 left in your Wii U or 3DS NNID account (or both, since you can merge the Wii U and 3DS), you can merge those funds with your Nintendo account and spend them across all devices. Another advantage of combining your accounts is for my Nintendo rewards. You earn points to complete achievements in games connected to your Nintendo account. These points can be redeemed for rewards that can be used across all your Nintendo devices. I redeemed my points for a cute Zelda 30th anniversary theme for 3DS, even though I had earned those points by playing Nintendo games on my iPhone. If you have an NNID and want to connect it to your Nintendo account, you can do so by accounts.nintendo.com from a web browser. You will need the username and password for both your Nintendo account and your NNID, so be sure to have them conveniently. Navigate to accounts.nintendo.com from a web browser. Enter the email address and password associated with your Nintendo account. Source: iMore Select user information from the menu on the left. Scroll down and select Edit next to Linked Accounts. Source: iMore Check the box next to Linked Network ID. Enter the user name and password associated with your NNID if prompted. Source: iMore Now you can switch to the eShop on switch and merge your funds, so you can buy games across all your Nintendo devices (well, three of them, at least) using the same account. I can't imagine any reason why you'll unlink your two accounts once you've linked them, but that's an option. Note: If you unlink your NNID account from your Nintendo account, all funds will be transferred to your Nintendo Account. You can re-merge your funds if you reconnect your accounts in the future. Navigate to accounts.nintendo.com from a web browser. Enter the email address and password associated with your Nintendo account. Source: iMore Select user information from the menu on the left. Scroll down and select Edit next to Linked Accounts. Source: iMore Untick box next to the linked Nintendo Network ID. Source: iMore Now you know how to connect or unlink your Nintendo ID with your Nintendo account. This will help transfer data from one console to another as when you bring data Nintendo 3DS to your Nintendo Switch. Additional equipment if you are looking for a way to improve your Switch gaming experience, you can really consider getting the following accessories.
